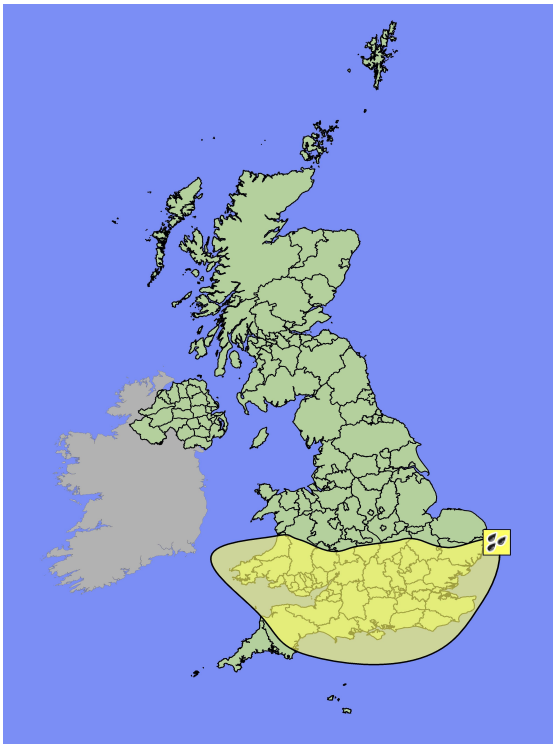
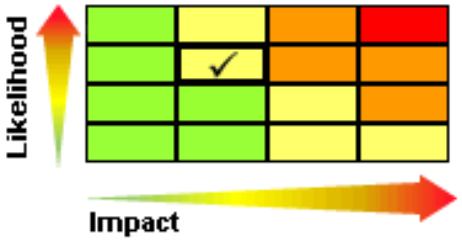
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
Frontal systems moving northwestwards from the continent are bringing heavy rain. A further 10-20mm is likely in places, and perhaps as much as 30mm over south Wales. There will continue to be marked spatial variations in rainfall amounts.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 21:00 on Mon, 30th Apr 2012 until 15:00 on Tue, 01st May 2012

Outbreaks of rain, heavy and possibly thundery, are continuing to affect southern England, the south Midlands and the southern half of Wales. The public should be aware that, following recent heavy rainfall, further localised flooding is possible and that driving conditions could be difficult, especially this morning due to standing water.

The Amber Warning for Devon, Dorset and Somerset has now been removed since the rain is beginning to ease here. However, there will still be a good deal of standing water and a continued risk of localised flooding since river levels remain high.

As we move through today the heavy rain will gradually ease from the south.

In addition, strong northeasterly winds are affecting the Midlands and parts of Wales.
